SUMMARY: Enacts the Fair Debt Buyers Practices Act, imposing various requirements on practices that may be used to collect on purchased consumer debt. Specifically, this bill:

- 1) Prohibits a debt buyer from making any written statement in an attempt to collect a consumer debt unless the debt buyer possesses certain information, including, among other things: a) the debt balance at charge off; b) the date of default or last payment; c) the name and address of the charge-off creditor at the time of charge off, and all persons or entities that purchased the debt after charge off; and d) a statement that the buyer is the sole owner of the debt or has authority to assert the rights of all owners of the debt.
- 2) Prohibits a debt buyer from making any written statement to a debtor in an attempt to collect a consumer debt unless the debt buyer has access to a copy of a contract or other document evidencing the debtor's agreement to the debt, or if no signed contract exists, demonstrating that the debt was incurred by the debtor.
- 3) Requires a debt buyer to provide all of the above information or documents to the debtor without charge within 15 calendar days of receipt of a debtor's written request for information regarding the debt or proof of the debt, or to cease all collection of the debt until the debt buyer provides the information or documents to the debtor.
- 4) Requires the debt buyer to provide a specified written notice with its initial written communication to the debtor that, among other things, informs the debtor of his or her right to request records from the debt buyer showing information that the debt buyer is required to possess as a condition of collecting on the debt.
- 5) Prohibits a debt buyer from bringing suit, initiating another proceeding, or taking any other action to collect a consumer debt if the applicable statute of limitations on the cause of action has expired.
- 6) Requires specific information regarding the underlying debt, the debt buyer, the debtor, and charge-off creditors to be so stated in any action brought by a debt buyer on a consumer debt.
- 7) Provides that in an action initiated by a debt buyer, no default or other judgment may be entered against a debtor unless the following authenticated documents have been submitted by the debt buyer to the court:

- a) Business records establishing facts about the debt, debtor, and charge-off creditors that are required by this act to be alleged in the complaint; and
 - b) A copy of a contract or other document evidencing the debtor's agreement to the debt, or if no signed contract exists, demonstrating that the debt was incurred by the debtor.
- 8) Provides that, in an action brought by an individual, a debt buyer who violates any provision of this act with respect to any person is liable to the person in an amount equal to the sum of the following: a) actual damages sustained as a result of the violation; b) statutory damages, as specified for an individual or class action; and c) costs of the action and reasonable attorney's fees.
- 9) Relieves a debt buyer from any liability under this act if the debt buyer shows by a preponderance of the evidence that the violation was not intentional and resulted from a bona fide error, and occurred notwithstanding the maintenance of procedures reasonably designed to avoid any such error.
- 10) Provides that these requirements shall only apply to debt buyers with respect to all consumer debt sold or resold on or after January 1, 2014.
- 11) Requires a claim of exemption and related financial statement form to be provided to a judgment debtor by the levying officer whenever a writ of execution or an earnings withholding order is served upon the judgment debtor or the debtor's employer, as specified.

FISCAL EFFECT: None

COMMENTS: This bill, sponsored by Attorney General Kamala Harris, seeks to enact the Fair Debt Buyer Practices Act, a comprehensive approach to address problems that, according to bill proponents, are largely traceable to the inadequacy of documentation maintained by the debt buying industry to support its debt collection activities and litigation. According to the author, "There have been widespread accounts of debt buyer collection efforts, including collection litigation, against the wrong person, or targeting debt that is time-barred or has already been paid. This bill establishes a number of reforms to ensure that the documentation used to support the collection of purchased debt is sufficient. This will help ensure that collection efforts target the correct individuals, avoid litigation over time-barred debt, and that the amount of the debt is calculated accurately."

According to proponents, California's courts are swamped with debt collection lawsuits at a time that could not be worse given recent court closures and the fiscal crisis facing our judicial system. A recent New York Times article reported that collection lawsuits across California have increased by 20% over the past five years, with an estimated 96,000 consumer debt collection cases filed in three Bay Area counties in 2009 alone, up from 53,700 cases in 2007. ("Some Lawyers Want to Keep Debt Collection Out of the Courts," NY Times, April 22, 2010.) Proponents contend that many of these lawsuits are simply unsubstantiated by facts necessary to determine, among other things, that the plaintiff owns the debt at issue, that the defendant is the person who truly owes the debt, or that the debt is not time-barred.

Furthermore, according to the author, many consumers report being the subject of collection lawsuits where there is insufficient evidence of the consumer's underlying indebtedness, or where not enough information is provided to the consumer regarding the debt at issue to allow an appropriate answer to the complaint. A recent report by Consumers Union and East Bay Community Law Center (EBCLC) found that debt buyers frequently buy portfolios of individual consumer debts with inadequate information, and frequently sue without any proof that they own the debts or that the consumer owes them money. ("Past Due: Why Debt Collection Practices and the Debt Buying Industry Need Reform Now," Consumers Union, January 2011.)

Accordingly, this bill prohibits a debt buyer from contacting a debtor unless the debt buyer has access to a copy of a contract or other document evidencing the debtor's agreement to the debt or responsibility for incurring the debt, as well as other specific factual information establishing the buyer's right to collect. This essential factual information includes, among other things, the debt balance at charge off, the date of default or last payment, and the names and addresses of the charge-off creditor, debt buyer, and debtor as they appear in the records of the debt. The bill also requires the debt buyer to provide the information or documents to the debtor without charge within 15 days upon request of the debtor, and to include a specified notice informing the debtor of this right. These requirements seek to ensure that the consumer will at least have basic information about the debt in question that is necessary to determine a next step, including filing an answer if a complaint has been served.

In 2011, the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) issued an extensive report in which it found that complaints filed by debt collectors to initiate collection actions against debtors do not provide sufficient information to the defendant-debtor or the court about the underlying debt or the collector's right to collect. To address these problems identified by the FTC, this bill promotes greater transparency and clarity with respect to the allegations required in a lawsuit filed by a debt buyer, as well as the evidence required of a debt buyer to obtain a judgment in a collection suit. First, the bill requires the complaint in any collection suit to allege, among other things, the nature of the underlying debt and the consumer transactions from which it is derived, and that the debt buyer is the sole owner of the debt at issue or has the right to collect the debt. The complaint shall also allege the same specific factual information about the debt that the debt buyer is required to possess in order to initiate a written contact with the debtor.

According to the FTC, about 95% of collection lawsuits end in default judgments, which the author contends is the business model for some debt buyers who file thousands of collection lawsuits each year. The FTC's report noted concern about the number of default judgments, and recommended that states take steps to "increase consumer participation in debt collection litigation to help decrease the prevalence of default judgments." Accordingly, this bill would prohibit entry of a default or other judgment against the debtor unless the debt buyer submits to the court: 1) authenticated business records establishing the factual information about the debt that the debt buyer is required to possess and allege in the complaint; and 2) a copy of a contract or other document evidencing the debtor's agreement to the debt, or responsibility for incurring the debt. In addition, if a debt buyer seeks a default judgment but has not complied with the requirements of this bill, the bill would prohibit the court from entering a default judgment for the debt buyer and allow the court, in its discretion, to dismiss the action. This provision seeks to provide a strong incentive for the debt buyer to provide all required information to the court prior to pursuing a default judgment.

As a practical matter, it is expected that many consumers would not be able to find an attorney to represent them in collection matters, or cannot afford attorney fees. Proponents contend, quite reasonably, that in collection suits where the debt buyer cannot provide adequate information to prove that the consumer actually owes the debt alleged, the consumer should not have a default judgment entered against him simply because he is unsophisticated or could not afford legal representation. This bill seeks to end that basic unfairness in collection cases where the debt buyer does not substantiate or support his claim with adequate information.

The FTC's report also expressed concern that certain collectors "regularly sue consumers on time-barred debts." This practice is likely to continue as long as many consumers do not defend suits against them, even when the action would be barred by the statute of limitations, because they do not know or realize that this is the case. According to the FTC, "Because an expired statute of limitations is an affirmative defense in most states, collectors have no obligation to allege in the complaint that the debt is not time-barred, and many collectors do not include this information. If consumers do not defend, there is no one to raise the defense that the debt is time-barred . . . Even if a debt collection action appears to be time-barred, it would be improper for courts to consider affirmative defenses that no party had raised. As a result, some courts appear to be granting default judgments on time-barred debt." (FTC Report, July 2010.)

To address this concern, this bill expressly prohibits a debt buyer from bringing suit or initiating arbitration or any other legal proceeding to collect a consumer debt if the applicable statute of limitations on the debt buyer's claim has expired. This common-sense restriction helps protect consumers from litigation on debts they have no legal obligation to pay, which as EBCLC notes, may include debts resulting from identity theft, mistake, and debts already paid, in addition to debts barred by statutes of limitations.
